10. Zool. and Bot. A group or class of animals or plants (usually constituting a subdivision of a genus) having certain common and permanent characteristics which clearly distinguish it from other groups.

The exact definition of a species, and the criteria by which species are to be distinguished (esp. in relation to genera or varieties), have been the subject of much discussion.

d. Physics. (i) Of or designating a dimensionless number equal to the ratio of the value of a property of a given substance to the value of the same property of some reference substance (as water) or of vacuum under the same conditions, so providing a relative value for comparison with different substances, as specific gravity (see GRAVITY 4 c); specific heat (see HEAT sb. 2 d); specific inductive capacity = dielectric constant s.v. DIELECTRIC a. 2 b; specific viscosity, the difference between the viscosity of a solution of a given concentration and that of the pure solvent, divided by the viscosity of the pure solvent.

1838 M. FARADAY in Phil. Trans. R. Soc. CXXVIII. 33, I feel satisfied that the experiments altogether fully prove the existence of a difference between dielectrics as to their power of favouring an inductive action through them; which difference may .. be expressed by the term specific inductive capacity. 1918 Physical Rev. XII. 50 One arm was then filled with water, and the other with a mixture of water and ethyl alcohol, the specific inductive capacity of which was known. 1935 Jrnl. Physical Chem. XXXIX. 157 Staudinger later adopted the term 'specific viscosity', for the quantity η_r-1. 1944 [see PERMITTIVITY]. 1959 K. HENNEY Radio Engin. Handbk. (ed. 5) iv. 2 The dielectric constant K of an insulating material is the ratio of the capacitance C_x of a capacitor using the material as the dielectric to the capacitance C_a using air as the dielectric... This property of the material is sometimes called inductivity or specific inductive capacity. 1966 M. L. MILLER Struct. Polymers v. 206 At the hightest rate of shear used in these experiments, the reduced specific viscosity was independent of concentration.

(ii) Of or designating a physical quantity that is referred to a unit of mass, volume, or other measure in order to form a number independent of the properties of the particular system studied, and so measuring an inherent property or characteristic that can be scaled to describe a given system or used as an indicator of the effect of an action or process, as specific acoustic impedance (see IMPEDANCE 2); specific activity, the activity of a given radioisotope per unit mass; specifc charge, the ratio of the charge of an ion or sub-atomic particle to its mass; specific conductance, conductivity, the conductivity of unit length of a material of unit cross-sectional area; the reciprocal of resistivity (see RESISTIVITY 1); specific (fuel) consumption, the weight of fuel consumed by an engine per unit time per unit of power or thrust developed; the reciprocal of specific impulse; specific impulse (see IMPULSE sb. 2 c); specific ionization, the number of ion pairs produced by an ionizing particle per unit path length; specific refraction, refractive constant, a constant relating the refractive index (n) of a material to its density (ρ), given by $(n^2 - 1)/(\rho(n^2 + 2))$; specific resistance, resistivity = RESISTIVITY 1; specific rotation, rotary power, the angle through which the plane of polarization of light of a specified wavelength is rotated by passage through a column of an optically active substance of given length (usu. 10 cm.) and at unit concentration; specific surface, the surface area per unit volume of a finely-divided substance; specific thrust = specific impulse above; specific volume, the volume of a substance per unit mass; the reciprocal of density.

In mod. use, there is a tendency to restrict the application of specific to quantities that are referred to unit mass. Accordingly, alternative terms are being advocated to replace those that do not conform to this narrow definition, as conductivity for specific conductance and specific canductivity, relative density for specific gravity, specific heat capacity (which is referred to unit mass) for specific heat, dielectric constant or relative permittivity for specific inductive capacity, and resistivity for specific resistance and specific resistivity.
